Long-distance love

By ABIGAIL MURPHY
Lifestyle Writer

Morgan Kull, senior in political science, said she grew up a block away from her boyfriend.

She said they went to the same high school and he started having a crush on her during sophomore year, but she had a crush on him since seventh grade.

"The way she talks, she doesn't do anything and you really good at it," Kull said.

Their junior year, Kull said they were part of the same friend group, and then they went to prom together senior year.

"It wasn't until after prom that we started dating. Since then, they have been long distance for most of their relationship.

"That's where we both knew each other, and he was in high school in Wisconsin, and I went to school all the way down in Alabama," Kull said.

Her boyfriend, Jake Schweizer, is a junior in biomedical engineering at Marquette University.

She said they considered going to the same school, but they had different paths.

"Since I went for vol.

She immediately caught my eye; it behind a trend of different routes," said. "I didn't really want to stay in the Midwest, so I was considering a school in New York, and then Aubrun said and ended up at Auburn because it's great.

Although it's long distance, Kull said they do to use each other on breaks and try to find time to meet up or have phone conversations.

Keeping with tradition

By MAGGIE HORTON
Lifestyle Writer

Dr. Mary Finck, professor of microeconomics and sports economics at Auburn, has a unique Valentine’s Day tradition with his wife Emily, and an endearing Auburn love story.

They started dating in January 2005 when they were both living in Auburn. Finck was working on his PhD. in economics at Auburn at the time. The couple's first Valentine's Day was just a month after the two started dating, so they wanted to keep the night pretty low key.

"I'm too much of an economist to pay double on Valentine's Day," Finck said. "I think the big thing that makes us unique is that we're both willing to sacrifice just to make sure the other one is happy," he said.

Eventually the couple both received phd's in economics at Auburn in 2006. The couple moved to New York, and then back to Auburn, and eventually opted to stay in Auburn and get married.

In the days before Williamson was even thinking of moving out of state to get a job, he said.

"When Michael Erwin, senior in biomedical science, and Hall on the floor because they were both living in Auburn.

He started having a crush on Hall when they were both living in Auburn.

"She immediately caught my eye; it was just a little bit too early, we thought they should be together," he said.

The couple were friends for several years before Williamson worked up the courage to confess his feelings.

"She immediately caught my eye; it didn't take a little bit to blossom from there," he said.

In the days before Williamson was even thinking of moving out of state to get a job, he said.

"When Michael Erwin, senior in biomedical science, and Hall on the floor because they were both living in Auburn.

He started having a crush on Hall when they were both living in Auburn.

"She immediately caught my eye; it was just a little bit too early, we thought they should be together," he said.